As most fellers already know, the market for pulpwood is growin' every year, as the demand for 350 pounds of paper and paper-board a year. And that means Silas – to grow pulpwood.

Less than 50 years ago, I was tellin' Silas the other day, the pulpwood mills used only a few kinds of wood sech as spruce, poplar and maple. But today they need ten times as much pulp, and have many new uses for their products, so the list of woods now includes ash, basswood, beach birch, cherry, elm, gum, hemlock hickory, maple, pine, poplar, syca more – in fact, almost any kind! Ol

* * * *
What's more, the pulp mills accept smaller trees than the lumber mills do – and this means a tree farmer, by careful selection of his trees, can find a market for his whole crop! And he won't lose as much wood when he cuts the de fects out of his logs, either - be cause pulp mills generally use five foot logs, as opposed to the twelve-or sixteen-foot lengths required for lumber. In many cases, pulpwood pays better than other cash crops a

The future for pulpwood looks bright, the experts say. They list four main reasons for this fact: 1) Better duce the labor requirements. 3) Bet-ter cutting techniques—leaving a good growing stock of young lumber after each cut. 4) Better use of wood by the mills—which are always lookin' for ways to use those trees that are plentiful but in little demand for
